Historical Note:

Fourierism, founded by Charles Fourier, advocated the reorganization of society into small communities or phalanxes. Fourier’s principles were advocated by the “Société pour la propagation et la réalisation de la théorie de Fourier” and the Ecole Sociétaire in Paris, France.

After Fourier's death in 1837, Victor Considérant became the most influential of Fourier’s disciples. Because of his political activities, Considérant was forced to leave France in 1849 and settle in Belgium.

In the early 1850s, Considérant came to the United States to establish a Fourierist colony. The colony was established in Réunion, Texas, in 1855 but was dissolved by 1857.

The foremost advocate of Fourierism in the United States was Albert Brisbane who renamed it Associationism and corresponded frequently with Considérant about his efforts to advance Fourierism/Associationism in the United States.

Arrangement:

The letters are in no discernible order.

Scope and Content Note:

The Archives Sociétaire consists of 208 letters, all but a few in French, dating from 1832 to 1882. The letters are not the entire Archives but rather selected letters requested by a researcher for a now unknown research topic. The letters are listed as they appear on the microfilm; each letter is numbered in the inventory but this number does not appear on the microfilm. Also included on the inventory are “targets” that appear periodically on the microfilm to aid the researcher in locating a particular letter.

The letters are primarily the correspondence of Victor Considérant, Albert Brisbane, and others interested in Fourierism and the Fourierist colony in Réunion, Texas. Both men were also interested in currency reform, and later correspondence documents their concerns and ideas on this subject.
