David Burbank's sister, Elizabeth Burbank Hyde, donated his papers to the Western Historical Manuscript Collection on May 19, 1987. David Burbank attended St. Louis University's School of Commerce and Finance, graduated as a diesel engine mechanic from Hemphill Diesel Engineering School in St. Louis in 1935 and the Berlitz School of Languages in 1936. He joined the AFL as a member of the Metal Stamping and Assemblers Union in 1933. Burbank maintained an active interest in labor history, socialism and union organizing. In 1935 he edited Gas House Worker, the daily strike bulletin published by the St. Louis Gas House Workers in its strike against Laclede Gas (see collection S0239).

In the early 1930s Burbank worked at the Missouri Botanical Garden. He joined the library staff at Washington University in 1956 and was promoted to Acquisitions Supervisor in 1966. During this period, he completed work on a book documenting what happened in St. Louis during the week of the U. S. general strike in July 1877. The events in St. Louis remain particularly interesting to historians because of the extent to which the city became ruled by the socialist-led striking workers (see also collection 320.) A Microcard publication based on Burbank's research, entitled City of Little Bread: The St. Louis General Strike of 1877, appeared in 1957. Burbank published an abridged version of this publication, entitled Reign of the Rabble, as a book in 1966. It asserted that the St. Louis strike was the first true American general strike, examining the character of the labor and socialist movements of the 1870s, the emergence of blacks as an element of industrial society, and the social attitudes of the St. Louis upper class and the press. Choice described the book as "a lively, but prejudiced and simplistic analysis, interesting, with vital information for the labor historian." Burbank's knowledge of locale as a St. Louis native and his experience as a labor organizer contribute to the book's importance as a chronicle of the 1877 general strike.

David Burbank died in April 1987.

SCOPE AND CONTENT

The Burbank papers primarily contain correspondence and research materials for his book, Reign of the Rabble, an account of the St. Louis general strike in 1877. The collection is divided into three series: 1. Personal Papers, 1932-1957, folders 1-18; 2.Reign of the Rabble Research, 1950-1966, folders 19-86; and 3. Includes Burbank's educational certificates and enrollment agreements; membership books and withdrawal cards from the AFL and the United Office and Professional Workers of America, 1933 and 1941; correspondence and newsclippings on a gift Burbank made to the St. Louis Art Museum in 1942; correspondence and newsletters on Interlingua, an artificial international language like Esperanto that Burbank studied as a hobby from the 1930s to the 1950s; letters he wrote on labor-related topics to the editors of the Post-Dispatch and Progressive magazine; letters-to-editor and position papers by H.D. Coleman, Burbank's associate in the Independent Socialist League; and newsclippings Burbank collected on New Harmony, Indiana and the Shakers.

Reign of the Rabble condenses information from Burbank's 1957 Microcard publication, City of Little Bread: The St. Louis General Strike of 1877. Series 2 includes a draft of City of Little Bread with additions and corrections, Burbank's correspondence with libraries, researchers and surviving strike participants. The series also contains minutes, memorials, journals and historical sketches from unions involved with the strike, including the International Furniture Workers, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, Cabinet Makers' Union Local 12, the Terminal Railroad Association, the Cigar Maker's International Union and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; and an issue of Labor Age with an article on a 1931 convention of rank and file members of a coal mining union held in St. Louis. The series also includes the declaration of principles of the Workingman's Party, a German socialist group involved with the strike, and microfilm copies of the naturalization papers of Albert Currin, the Workingman's Party's leading spokesman. The bulk of the Reign of the Rabble series contains the note cards used by Burbank for his book research in 1954. Burbank divided the cards into five packages, only one of which he labeled "used".

SERIES 3 - REGIONAL POLITICAL LITERATURE 1932-1955, FOLDERS 87-104
Burbank collected literature from several socialist and labor groups in St. Louis and surrounding areas. This series includes newsletters and publications of the ADVANCE Cooperative Publishing House, the Community of Correspondence in Elletsville, Indiana; union bulletins of Crown Can employees; issues of the organ of the Militant Left-Wing Miners of America, entitled The Fighting Miner, published in Springfield, Illinois in the 1930s; the Labor Historians Bulletin, published in Champaign-Urbana, 1953-1955; and CIO organizing fliers in southeast Missouri, 1942. The series also includes issues of the Worker's Party Bulletin and Forum, published by the Independent Socialist League.
