Historical Note:

Nathaniel Cook first discovered hematite, an iron ore, in the Maramec Springs area while surveying for the US General Land Office in 1823. He wrote that it would serve as an excellent iron works in his report. Thomas James, an Ohio banker and merchant, met up with a band of hematite painted Shawnee in 1825. He realized that their paint might be from an economically valuable deposit so he asked to be led there by the Native Americans. When James visited the area, he also realized it had all the resources needed for an iron works all in one small area. There was an accessible iron deposit, a large spring for waterpower, limestone/dolomite to use as a flux, and good timber to provide firewood. James established the first iron smelter west of the Mississippi in 1826.

Thomas James transferred the iron works to his son William in 1843. High demand during the Civil War and modernization kept the iron works in operation until 1876. Two major drawbacks to the Maramec Iron Works, which helped lead to its downfall, were that it was far from large markets and that the transportation network in the area was poorly developed at the time. During the heyday of the iron works, a company town housing 500 people existed nearby.

When William James died in 1912, his granddaughter Lucy Wortham James acquired the spring and surrounding land. When she died in 1938 her will directed that her estate be turned into a trust, which created the James Foundation.

Arrangement:

The collection has been arranged into the following three series:

Business Records

Correspondence

Volumes

Scope and Content Note:

Business Records

The Business Records are arranged by type of material and include checks, receipts, store orders, and “small books” that include accounts, time records, store records, and bank and credit records.

Correspondence

The Correspondence is arranged chronologically and covers the years from 1827 to 1878. More complete descriptions of the correspondence can be found in the folder descriptions in the container list that follows this scope and content note.

Volumes

The Volumes series consist of books created by the Maramec Iron Works; the James General Store; the Chillicothe (Ohio) Iron Works, owned by Thomas James; the Ozark Iron Works, developed by William James near Rolla, Missouri; and the Hesperian Club, a literary club that William James belonged to. More complete descriptions of the books can be found in the folder list that follows.
