HISTORY:

The origins and antecedents of the Greater Kansas City Chamber of Commerce began with the founding of the Association for Public Improvement on October 21, 1856. Formed to look after the commercial interests of the city, the association served to encourage public enterprise and improvements, and in particular to work diligently to attract railroads to the area. From the beginning the organization functioned as a traditional Chamber of Commerce and on December 22, 1856, the founders amended their By-laws to adopt that name. Like many small communities hoping to grow, the promoters of Kansas City were eager to attract eastern money by offering public credit and bonds in exchange for stock in railroad companies. The Chamber engaged in these activities with some success, securing public votes to issue county bonds which carried the faith and credit of the state of Missouri. Unfortunately, the divisive effects of the border warfare and the Civil War limited the work of the organization until after 1865. Once that conflict ended, the Chamber tried again to address its goal to improve the community by attracting railroads to invest in Kansas City. This effort culminated in the building of the Kansas City (Hannibal) Bridge across the Missouri River. The Chamber found, however, that growth proved destructive as the enlarged business community, with more businessmen concerned with specialized interests, made organization and consensus less easy to attain. Despite repeated attempts to reorganize, including efforts to replace it with the Board of Trade in 1869, the Chamber virtually disappeared during the post war years. Even the short-lived Merchant's Exchange, established as a substitute for the Chamber, failed because of a lack of local business consensus.

By the mid-1880's a leadership again began to coalesce within a renewed, confident, and dedicated business community. The real estate dealers created an "exchange", the bankers established a clearing-house association, and the Mercantile Exchange formed to serve as a credit bureau. These uniting activities set the stage for the first meeting of the Commercial Club of Kansas City on July 29, 1887, to promote civic projects and the city. The goals of the initial membership of fifty-seven businessmen were to encourage "good will" and to widen Kansas City's trade territory. Within two years of its founding the Club further defined its vision with the adoption of the slogan: "Make Kansas City a good place to live in." Standing committees were established on entertainment, arbitration, manufacturing, legislation, transportation, and labor. The Club also became the promotional center for the community, beginning with President and Mrs. Grover Cleveland's visit to the city in October, 1887; the building of the Exposition Building; and the Priest of Pallas parades and balls. An important activity for the Club was sponsorship of tours to Kansas City's real, and hoped for, hinter-lands. Efforts to attract manufacturing to Kansas City again focused upon the city's position as a transportation hub, and included the encouragement of river navigation as a competitor to the railroads. Another concern resulted in the founding of the Kansas City Insurance Company as the Club's attempt to provide low-cost local alternatives to the eastern insurance companies.

Virtually every civic, political, and social occurrence in the community had connections to the Commercial Club, including the rebuilding in 1900 of the burned Convention Hall, the relief and rebuilding from the disastrous 1903 flood, and most of what is considered the heyday of the "Kansas City Spirit." Members paid active attention to local affairs, political issues, as well as their own business interests. Many of Kansas City's leading citizens were associated with the Commercial Club, among whom were E.M. Clendening, August R. Meyer, C.J. Schmelzer, and Uriah S. Epperson.

In 1916, the Commercial Club changed its name to the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City acknowledging its role and position. The variety of activities of the Chamber always reflected the needs and interests of the city. Among its more important programs were the establishment of the city airport, hosting the 1928 Republican National Convention, the 10-Year Plan resulting in major public improvements, the construction of Kansas City International Airport, and the Prime-time initiative to bring national and international attention to the Kansas City region which lead to the 1976 Republican National Convention being held in the city. The Chamber continues to play a vital and active part in the development of the Greater Kansas City community.
