Introduction

Approximately 90 cubic feet

The Double Helix Corporation Records document the activities of a non-profit, community media corporation incorporated in St. Louis in 1971 to preserve and expand non-commercial, community broadcasting. The records reflect Double Helix's search for radio and TV broadcasting frequencies after the demise of KDNA radio. The collection includes petitions to the FCC for share-time with radio stations KSLH and KHRU as well as later applications for television broadcasting on Channels 18, 40, and 46. Opposing petitions filed by competitors for these frequencies, including the independent petition filed by KETC-TV for the use of Channel 40. The FCC ruling on the television channels appears within the series as well as Double Helix's application for a federal grant, correspondence, minutes, notes, and membership lists. Also included in the collection are programming tapes from KDNA/KDHX.

Double Helix, a non-profit media corporation, was incorporated in St. Louis on August 12, 1971, to preserve and expand the non-commercial, community broadcasting of radio, station KDNA-FM. KDNA was founded in 1969 as an independent radio station providing programming alternatives to commercial stations, the first "underground" station in St. Louis. It was supported by private contributions until the founding of Double Helix, which sought to secure the station's financial basis as a public, non-profit group. A fund-raising effort in August 1972 failed to prevent co-owners Lorenzo Milan and Jeremy Lansman from selling the station to commercial interests.

In May 1972 Double Helix approached the St. Louis Board of Education with a proposal to share broadcast time on KSLH, the Board's educational FM frequency. The Board refused to cooperate and the FCC denied Double Helix's time-share application in January 1973. The corporation then requested that Clayton High School move its 10-watt radio station, KHRU, to another FM frequency to allow room for a full-power facility operated by Double Helix. Although Double Helix offered to pay the expenses of the change, the Clayton School Board refused the offer. In October 1973, Double Helix filed a petition with the Federal Communications Commission to have KHRU show cause for its refusal. The eight-year legal battle that followed ended with a historic decision by the FCC in 1981 to de-regulate 10-watt broadcast facilities, allowing more powerful stations to claim their frequencies. In 1982 Double Helix was awarded a construction permit for frequency 88.1 FM, formerly held by KHRU, and a $130,000 grant from the U.S. Commerce Department.

In May 1974, Double Helix also filed an application with the FCC to use channel 40 of the UHF television band for a non-profit community television station. The St. Louis Educational Television Commission (KETC-TV) also petitioned for the use of channel

40 in October 1974. A challenge to SLETC's petition by the St. Louis Broadcast Coalition, a consortium of community groups, ended any hope of a quick decision on the status of the channel. In 1976 Double Helix also petitioned the FCC for the use of Channel 18, but withdrew the petition after Southern Illinois University-Edwardsville contested it. In July 1979, the FCC did assign Channel 46 to St. Louis at the request of Double Helix but rescinded the assignment the following month when SLETC withdrew its application for Channel 40, making it available to Double Helix.

The Double Helix corporation then began an eight-year legal battle to gain control of the only remaining FM frequency available for high-powered broadcasting, 88.1 FM. Double Helix won legal claim to the frequency in 1981 (see collection S0199). During the period after it left the air, the corporation remained viable by using CETA funds to develop production, programming, media workshops, and job training. Double Helix also began developing programs for community television access, first pursuing a UHF station and later a cable channel, which was granted in 1983.

The radio and television branches of Double Helix grew separately, with television moving to a separate building on Euclid in 1983 (see collection S0199). The radio operation shared a facility with the Central Regional Midwestern Education Laboratories (CEMREL) on Campbell and started building studio space. Owners of the building sold it, however, and the ensuing legal dispute led to a further delay in Double Helix's return to the radio waves.

Double Helix resumed broadcasting on the 88.1 frequency on October 14, 1987, under the call letters KDHX.
