Introduction

Approximately 49 cubic feet

Maury Rubin founded the St. Louis Labor Tribune in 1935 to help expose poor quality work on non-union housing projects in St. Louis. Rubin's nephew, Ed Finkelstein, became publisher in the late 1970s, and Rubin died in 1984. The collection primarily includes the paper's photograph negative morgue. Also included in the collection are correspondence, memoranda, and newspaper clippings documenting labor-related events and news stories.

In 1935, while studying architecture at Washington University, Maury Rubin founded the St. Louis Labor Tribune. The newspaper initially appeared as a monthly broadsheet entitled the Union Labor Advocate and changed its name in June 1937. In the second issue, Rubin teamed with Carpenters District Council leader Dick Adams to report on the poor quality of construction work at local non-union housing projects. The report and the newspaper's weekend leafletting of the construction sites led to union organizing of nearly the entire St. Louis construction industry. This, in turn, led to the continued low cost of housing in the metropolitan St. Louis area.

Rubin guided the development of the Labor Tribune for its first forty years along with a colorful staff that gave the newspaper character. Staff members included Ben Sabol, a cane-wielding photographer who brought a ladder to his shoots, facilitating wide-angle perspectives on group labor photographs; editorial chief Harry Winkeler, a devout anti-Communist whose red-bashing editorials were reprinted by newspapers around the country; and a phone-bound ad salesman, Harry Barge.

A staunch opponent of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, Maury Rubin organized an American Federation of Labor (AFL)-affiliated union for journalists in St. Louis in 1937, the Advertising, Publicity, and Newspaper Representatives Local 20711. The Labor Tribune staff was later reorganized under Local 47 of the Newspaper Guild the AFL-CIO merger in 1955. Even since that time, however, the Labor Tribune's support of the AFL against the CIO has kept most CIO unions from subscribing.

In 1947, the Labor Tribune began to organize another labor newspaper in East St. Louis called the Southern Illinois Labor Tribune. The newspaper was printed in the National Stockyards, the site of the Livestock Reporter. However, The Southern Illinois Labor Tribune closed its advertising and circulation office in East St. Louis after refusing to fall victim to a protection racket. In 1955, Rubin offered his help to the AFL to start an official newspaper to report on organized labor in Indiana. Gene San Soucie, president of AFL Teamster Joint Council 69 for the state of Indiana, served as the associate editor.

St. Louis Labor Tribune advertising salesman Joe Gordon later handled the Indiana paper's business operations. Rubin attempted to continue the Indiana Labor Tribune after San Soucie died in an airplane crash in 1973, but economic factors eventually caused it to fold.

The St. Louis Labor Tribune built its reputation by being at the forefront of national issues that affected labor. It took strong positions against the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act and the Landrum-Griffin Amendments in 1959. Locally, it opposed anti-collective bargaining measures by the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Newspaper Guild, exposed shoddy workmanship, and promoted worker safety. The paper was partly supported by Maury Rubin's ownership of Quality Beverages, a beer distributorship. In March 1957, the St. Louis Labor Tribune changed its broadsheet format to that of a tabloid.

Ed Finkelstein, Maury Rubin's nephew, joined the newspaper for a summer job when he was fourteen. After receiving a byline for writing an obituary, he decided to pursue a career in journalism. He graduated from the University of Missouri-Columbia's journalism school in 1959 and began serving as an information officer for the Strategic Air Command. When he left the service, Finkelstein returned to the Labor Tribune as an executive assistant to Maury Rubin. At odds with the staid Rubin, Finkelstein left the paper in the late 1960s and joined the Regional Industrial Development Corporation.

In 1970 Finkelstein began a public relations firm, Union Communications, to better the image of organized labor with local businesses. Jim Templeton became one of his first employees and later became the Tribune's managing editor. Much of the firm's business involved covering stories that appeared in the Labor Tribune. Finkelstein renegotiated his way back into the Labor Tribune operation with his uncle Maury; the latter was cognizant of his aging staff and the criticism the paper received as having grown stagnant. Shortly thereafter, Rubin retired as publisher emeritus. He died in 1984.

Finkelstein's combining of the newspaper and Union Communications helped restore the Labor Tribune's finances, which had suffered from the gambling loss of Rubin's beer distributorship. It also brought two essential members to the paper's staff: managing editor Jim Templeton and reporter/photographer Sherwood Kirker. Finkelstein's experiences with RIDC and public relations left the paper with a less confrontational style and one that aimed more to promote cooperation between labor and business. Nevertheless, the St. Louis Labor Tribune remained an influential defender of labor causes. The newspaper worked ceaselessly to expose worker safety hazards and the poor quality of non-union construction and assisted organized labor groups against anti-labor legislation. The St. Louis Labor Tribune also played a vital role in defeating Right-To-Work legislation in 1977. In 1984, the St. Louis Labor Tribune and the Southern Illinois Labor Tribune merged to form the St. Louis/Southern Illinois Labor Tribune.
